Kirtland's warbler's numbers reach highest point since 1961

Endangered warbler's population rebounds

THE first significant increase in two decades in the population of the world's most endangered woodland warbler, the Kirtland's, has occurred this summer in the jackpine stands of northern lower Michigan.

This summer's count of singing males, which is used as a population index, totaled 347. That is a 31 per
